When the Ontario government announced plans in March 2016 to amend the sex-ed curriculum in schools to emphasize biological and social relationships, the announcement sparked a storm of public debate. Opponents of the new curriculum (known as To Be Determined (TBD)) claimed that it would normalize sexual and gender identity, which is contrary to Christian teaching. For those pushing for the new curriculum, this meant that parents could finally get the sex-ed education they were looking for. Since that time, much has happened. The government has asked the courts to order the province's Catholic school board to end a lawsuit that claims the new curriculum will lead to "homosexual indoctrination" and "same-sex marriage." Christian parents and the Progressive Conservative Party have been denied a judicial review that would allow them to challenge the law and the curriculum, which was deemed unconstitutional in 2017. The Ontario Court of Appeal determined in a 5-2 ruling that the province was within its legal rights to pass the legislation. On Thursday, Ontario Superior Court Judge Michael Penny heard an appeal from Catholic, Protestant, and independent Christian schools challenging the government's right to require them to use the curriculum. In the meantime, the government says that principals can continue to offer alternative lessons to students under the new curriculum if they want to.
