Turro¹, Vaidyanathan Ramamurthy², and Juan C. Sciano³. ¹Solumbia University, New York. ²University of St. Louis, Louisville, Kentucky. ³University of Chicago, Illinois. Annotation. Current methods of determining the structure of organic molecules are often based on their interaction with a luminescent reagent. In such experiments, however, there is no way to observe the interaction of molecules in solution. Therefore, in order to obtain clear, reproducible results, it is necessary to isolate molecules from solution and analyze them under conditions similar to those in the gas phase.
